

Ken Rogers currently serves as Director of the Office of Enterprise Architecture and Planning in the Bureau of Information Resource Management at the US Department of State. Ken is an entrepreneurial, results-driven professional with over 25 years of experience working with multinationals, US and foreign government agencies, non-profit organizations, and small business start-ups.

Ken's private sector experience includes financial management, government contracting and relations, and information systems design and management in the aerospace and commercial electronics industry at Rockwell International and Unisys Corporation. During the 90s, as an economic and management consultant, Ken provided specialized international trade, development, and e-business assistance to government agencies and organizations in the US and throughout the developing world and provided Ken with the opportunity manage projects throughout Asia, Central & Eastern Europe, Latin American, and Africa where he gained an understanding of the challenges confronting small and medium size firms working in these regions.

Ken's public sector career includes serving as the Chief Information Officer and Chief Enterprise Architect and at the Department of Homeland Security, Science & Technology Directorate. Prior to that, Ken worked at the U.S. Department of Commerce, Bureau of Economic Analysis as the Chief Enterprise Architect overseeing IT Strategic and operational planning and at the Export Import Bank as the eCommerce Strategist where he designed, in collaboration with private sector banks, a secure and seamless end-to-end "trade finance portal" for delivering trade finance products to its customers.

Ken has complemented his diverse business background with continued academic and professional training, which includes an Executive Master of Science in Information Systems & Technology, George Washington University, a Master of International Management, University of Maryland, a Master of Public and International Affairs – Economic Development, University of Pittsburgh, and Graduate Certificates in Asian Studies, International Political Economy, and CIO Certification. Ken holds a Bachelor of Arts degree in Economics from Westmont College. Ken is also a professor at Nyack College and serves on the board of Ambleside School in Herndon VA.

Ken and his wife Pam live in Vienna, VA with their four children.