Merritt currently works on cyber critical infrastructure protection at the Department of Homeland Security Office of Cybersecurity & Communications. She has public and private sector expertise in emerging areas including the future of the internet, corporate interactions with government cyber, cybersecurity, internet law and policy. Merritt is a double Harvard graduate and has worked in technology law and policy in all three branches of government. She is a leader in internet policy, a technology company expert, and an adjunct professor of Cybersecurity at the University of Maryland.